Google

- Google (google.com) is a search engine. There are other search engines, but Google is the best.
- Google is for finding websites if you don't already know the address.
- New browsers have a Google search box in the top right hand corner of the screen – just type your search terms in there. On old browsers you have to go to the Google website (google.com) and use the search box in the middle of the screen.
- Once you are already in Google, you can use the search box at the top of the page for new searches – you don't have to go back to the start.
- Google works if you only put one word in; use more words to narrow down the search.
- When using Google, you DO need spaces between the words, but you don't need capital letters.
- Don't worry about spelling. Google is good at guessing which word you meant.
- Quote marks tell Google to search for a phrase rather than separate words.

Google has all sorts of features in addition to basic searching, and some of these (e.g. Google Maps) will be covered in future sessions. However, a particularly useful aspect is Google Images. If you are looking specifically for images, search as above, then click "images" in the top left corner to see image results only.

You can use Google to translate, too: <http://translate.google.com>

Advanced Google users will find this page useful:
